

ANTHROPOLOGY

Our Program

Are you curious about diverse cultures across the globe, both past and present? Anthropology is perfect for you! Anthropology is the study of humanity – our origins, behavior, and diverse ways of life. Anthropologists seek to understand the human experience through cultural, biological, and archaeological analysis of human societies. In our program, students enroll in one of three options: General Anthropology, Archaeology, and Applied Anthropology. Each of the three options provides students with a broad-based understanding of the diverse subject matter of anthropology.

Career Opportunities

As an anthropology major, you'll explore diverse cultures, societies, and human behavior through immersive fieldwork while developing strong analytical skills to study cultural phenomena. Career paths include:

- Cultural Resource Management
- International Development
- Public Health
- Environmental Conservation
- Museum Curation Forensic Anthropology
- Social Research
- Business and Marketing
- Graduate School
- And many more!

Degree Options

General Anthropology advances your expertise across all four anthropology fields: cultural, biological, archaeological, and linguistic.

Archaeology leverages cutting-edge techniques to analyze material culture that confront historically entrenched social and environmental inequalities.

Applied Anthropology uses anthropology to address real-world issues, from public health and environmental conservation to community development and social policy.

Student Life

Join the Anthropological Society to take part in field trips, community outreach, and serve as a departmental ambassador. Present research and build professional networks at national conferences like the American Anthropological Association.
